MOVEMENT.—Good movement is the foundation of all penmanship skill. You must practice the above exercises until the action of the arm is light and under perfect control. The above movement exercises contain the over and under shades embodying the principles of all shaded strokes. A thorough mastery of the above principles will be a good foundation for all shaded capitals. If you have mastered the movement exercises in the business handwriting, the shaded work will be much easier to accomplish. In making the above movement exercises, your first tendency will be to make them slowly, and resultingly heavy and lifeless. You must overcome this at once. The shades require the same free action as the light lines in business writing. They are made with a lively yet deliberate movement, a bold springy pressure of the pen, and a quick release, without stopping or checking the motion. Apply the foundation principles as outlined above, which is the only way that anyone has ever attained a high degree of skill in penmanship.

CAPITAL LETTER PRINCIPLES.—The above principles are used in more than half the capitals of the alphabet, and if thoroughly mastered, you will be able to make a great variety of capital letters by just modifying the principles as indicated in the capital letters throughout this course. Make eight or ten pages of the principles before beginning the first lesson on the next page. Practice the capital M in the three forms given, making at least one page of each. Then write one page of each of the words, doing your best to imitate the copies. Write one page of the sentences with the capital M. In the next lesson we have words beginning with the small i. Write from eight to ten lines of each word, and continue the practice of the other lessons in a similar way throughout the course. Ornamental Writing is not written as fast as Business Writing, as a great deal more care should be taken in the foundation of the letters. In following the lessons, do your best to imitate the copies at all times. Work more for form than for movement.
